

The Beauty of Nature

In this story, Ralph Waldo Emerson says that the ancient Greeks called the world 'beauty'. He believes that nature is the true beauty. All that surrounds us — the trees, the sky, the animals, the mountains — are part of nature's beauty, and a person's eye is the best artist, capturing these scenes and making them immortal. Nature heals and restores the human body and mind. Emerson also says that God created beauty.

God created beauty. In every religion, people believe that the world was created by gods. The natural things — forests, seas, oceans — were created by God, and because of this, I agree that beauty is created by God. I love to look at the sky, follow the movement of the clouds, admire the stars, and appreciate the beauty of the world. Humans are the main masterpiece because every person is different. I often look at people, especially their eyes. I think that every person has their own unique beauty.

Nature heals and restores humans. When a person leaves the city and goes to the forest, they are cut off from the world and can rest from their daily routine. They enjoy the beauty of nature, begin to think clearly, and understand what is happening in their mind. In the clear air of nature, a person relaxes, and their physical strength is restored. My family and I often go out of town for a picnic. There is a swing in that place, and I sit there and enjoy nature for hours.

The human eye is the best artist because it can make immortal what it sees in memory. A painter or a camera can't capture light and shadow as the human eye does. Writers can't describe a scene as beautifully as we can see it in real life with our eyes. Nature is very beautiful, and I am happy that I can admire the beauty of the sky, mountains, and animals.

In conclusion, I can say that I agree with Ralph Waldo Emerson. I believe that everything that surrounds us is beautiful. God created nature and humans. He gave people the opportunity to see and enjoy beauty.
